The Rabbit On the Moon

月のウサギ

Once upon a time, a rabbit, a fox and a monkey lived happily together. One day, the three friends saw an old man fallen over on the road. “Help...something to eat...anything...”, said the old man in a hoarse voice. The three animals quickly went to find food to help him.

The agile monkey brought him fruit from atop the trees. The clever fox brought him a fish from the river to eat. However, the rabbit could not find any food for the old man. “Although I am not very useful, I can still help. If you would like, please have me”, he said as he jumped into a burning fire to cook himself.

The old man was actually the moon god. He greatly respected the honorable actions of the little rabbit and pulled him out. For his noble heart, he made him live forever and took him to the moon to live with him and lived happily ever after.

If you grew up in an East Asian culture, you may have heard this or a similar story before. This is the story of 月のウサギ (tsuki no usagi), or “rabbit on the moon”. The tale has various origins from ancient China and Buddhist text, however the story has changed over time in different cultures. The previous story is one of the more predominant Japanese interpretations. In Western cultures, it’s often said that the shadows on the moon make it seem like a man’s face, hence the “man on the moon”. In Japan, it is said to look like there is a rabbit on the moon pounding mochi! What do you see?

This September was the Japanese lunar autumn holiday of tsukimi, also drawing origins from ancient Chinese culture. In the past, Japanese people would celebrate the moon during the harvest season and with days of good food and family gathering. People would often write poetry while drinking sake from a 盃 (sakazuki), an old sake-drinking tableware that looks like a small, deep plate. In modern times, people don’t really celebrate the day so much, but there are a couple of ways that people celebrate this day.

Tsukimi dango in a traditional 15-stack

You've probably seen rabbit-themed goods at local stores. One simple way people maintain the tsukimi traditions is by eating 月見団子. This is in reference to the mochi connection with the moon, and is said to give people health and strength. Another thing people do is decorate with ススキ (susuki), or Japanese pampas grass. In ancient times, it was said to represent rice plants and the harvest, and the imagery and symbolism of it has continued on to this day. Oftentimes, you'll see decorations like this throughout stores.

The rabbit-moon connection is found littered throughout Japanese pop culture as well. Two examples that come to mind are Sailor Moon and Naruto. Have you noticed that Sailor Moon's name is Tsukino Usagi? If you know these words in Japanese, you'll see "moon" in her family name, while her first name is literally "rabbit". In Naruto, one of the main villains is called Otsutsuki Kaguya, who if you watch the show, will learn of her connection to the moon and her final form that has the appearance of a rabbit. Next year, try celebrating with some tsukimi dango and see if you can see some rabbits making it on the moon!

How to Play Koi Koi

こいこいの遊び方

Hanafuda "flower cards", Japan's original playing cards. I'm sure you seen these bright and unique designs in various places throughout Japan. Their creation has a long and interesting history, but long story short, card games were brought to Japan from Europe and were then banned due to gambling. People kept inventing their own cards until eventually the first hanafuda set was created. It was then popularized and mass distributed throughout Japan. There are a number of games that can be played with a set of these cards, the two most popular being koi koi and hana awase. Today, I will introduce the rules so you can take part in this fun game!

About the Cards

Hanafuda has 12 suits of 4 cards each. Each suit represents a month (January–December) and is recognized by the flower depicted on the card. There are 24 cards with only the flower on them called kasu, 10 cards with a banner (3 blue, 3 red with black text) called tansaku, 5 special "light" cards (crane, cherry blossom curtain, the sun, a phoenix, and a man with an umbrella) called kō, and the rest are animal/object cards called tane. The goal of the game is to make sets with these cards and score the most points.

Rules/Flow

- 1) The dealer gives each player 8 cards and places 8 cards face up on the table and the deck face down.
- 2) The first player takes a card in his hand that matches the month (same flower design) of another card on the table and takes both cards.
- 3) The same player flips the top card of the deck. If it matches any of the cards on the table, take both cards.
- 4) The next player goes.
- 5) The first player to collect a yaku (set of cards) can choose to finish the game and add up their points from the yaku they build, or they can say koi koi and let the game continue to try and make a bigger yaku. If you finish, only you get points. If you koi koi and the other player makes a yaku, only that player gets points and they are doubled.
- 6) Play another round, this time the previous winner goes first. Have fun!
