Japanese New Year

日本のお正月

Happy New Year, pioneers! The festivities have subsided and the new year has officially begun! Did you enjoy the holidays Japanese style? The Japanese New Year, oshōgatsu (お正月) lasts from January 1-3. Like many other cultures, Japan looks forward to welcoming the new year with success and good will. Here are some customs in Japanese celebrations.

Kadomatsu

Preparing the Home

Before the New Year holiday, it is customary for Japanese to clean both the inside and outside of their homes in order to purify them before the new year. Decoration also plays a big role as Japanese pine decorations called kadomatsu (門松) are set up on both sides of the entrance of the home. This tradition is a good luck charm for the New Year. In addition, the Japanese practice the custom of hanging a sacred rope or wreath made of straw and strips of paper at their door entrance called a shimenawa (しめ縄) and shimekazari (しめ飾り) respectively. They're believed to prevent evil spirits from entering their home.

Nengajo

Nengajo—New Year Greeting Cards

Friends, family, and acquaintances often send post cards to each other and welcome in the New Year with New Year's cards called nengajo (年賀状). It is customary for the recipients of a nengajo to reply by January 7th. Collection at the post office starts in early December and the post office prides itself with delivering all cards in time for the new year.

Gifts

New Year's is a favorite holiday for children because they receive money from their parents. This New Year's gift is called otoshidama (お年玉). Relatives and close family members also bring otoshidama to the children and they are free to spend it however they want!

Kagamimochi

New Year's Dishes

What New Year's celebration would be complete without the mention of traditional foods! Some of the most traditional Japanese foods eaten during the New Year holiday include steamed rice that has been pounded into cakes and stacked called kagamimochi (鏡餅), vegetable dishes, dried persimmons, dried chestnuts, black peas, sardines, herring, roe, mandarin oranges, and a soup called zōni (雑煮). It is customary to serve ozōni for the first three days after the new year. People also prepare osechi (お節), a traditional Japanese style of cooking in which each food item has a special meaning related to the new year. Many people decide to create it themselves, but many opt to order it premade from grocery and department stores.

Osechi

Joya no Kane

Temple Bell Ringing

On New Year's Eve, Japanese wait up until midnight to hear the tolling of the bells at Japan's temples called joya no kane (除夜の鐘). Some can hear it from their homes, but many go directly to the temple to watch the bell being rung. Kyoto has one of the largest bells in the world, weighing 74 tons! Buddhists believe that a man has 108 sins and after hearing the bells toll for that number, he/she can be free from all of the sins from the previous year. On New Year's day, it is traditional for Japanese to spend the day worshiping miniature Buddhist and Shinto altars in their homes.

Hatsumōde

First Shrine or Temple Visit of the New Year

During the 3-day holiday, it is customary for people to practice hatsumōde (初詣). This is when people dress in their finest clothes and kimonos and visit the shrines and temples to pray for good luck and prosperity for the New Year. During this time, people eat street food such as rice wine and sweet chestnuts. It is also customary for people to pull their fortune to decide their luck for the new year called omikuji (おみくじ). There are different levels of luck that you can receive and each is followed by an explanation in old text.

Daruma

Making Wishes on Daruma

Some Japanese people also buy daruma (達磨) on New Year's. This doll is said to grant the wish of those who promise to fill in its eyes. The owner makes a wish and fills in one eye, and promises to fill in the other eye once the wish comes true. Daruma are returned to temples during the year and are burned collectively during early January.
